Fire Code to Cut Public Seating At D. C. Schools

Egress Law Limits Use of Auditoriums And Gymnasiums

By Coit Hendley, Jr.

Seating capacities in public school auditoriums, cafeterias and gymnasiums may be reduced materially when the new District fire prevention regulations for existing buildings go into effect on January 1. For the fiirst time, these "places of public assembly" in the schools will be subject to a check for seating capacity by the building inspector's office. Previously, in many instances, the only time the capacity was figured was when the building was constructed- in conformity with existing building codes. The school checkup has first priority in the inspections being made of more than 16,000 structures here preparatory to enforcement of the new fire prevention and fire control laws. On January 1 the new code, generally known as the "egress regulations," goes into effect for buildings in existence before March 8

May Cost $500,000.

The code is expected to cost the school system at least $500,000 to bring the older buildings into line. Just what the exact cost will be is not certain at present because the compilation of all that is wrong has not been completed

The schools have been inspected yearly by men from Fire Marshal Raymond C. Roberts' office, but these inspections never have included computing the capacity of the auditoriums, cafeterias and gymnasiums. Mr. Roberts said his inspections were made on the order of the

These four, all located on third floors, were at the old Bell Vocational High School (now the Bell Annex at Seventh and O streets N.W.), Terrell Junior High School, Hine Junior High School and Sumner Elementary School.

The fire marshal noted on his David I. McCoach, jr., chairman of report that they did not have sufficient fireproof exits. School officials closed them on advice of the Commissioners, who acted on the recommendation of the building inspector's office.

As a result of the annual inspection reports of the fire marshal, School Supt. Hobart M.
